To Each His Own [Unit 8]

He doesn’t care for Dali.
The colors are too bright.
He says that Picasso
got everything just right.
She can’t stand the movies
that are filmed in Hollywood.
She likes Almodóvar.
She thinks he’s really good.
He’s inspired by everything
she thinks is second-rate.
She’s moved and fascinated by the things he loves to hate.
He’s crazy about art that only turns her heart to stone.
I guess that’s why they say
to each his own.
He likes pencil drawings.
She prefers photographs.
He takes her to the art museum,
but she just laughs and laughs.
He loves the Da Vinci
that’s hanging by the door.
She prefers the modern art
that’s lying on the floor.
“No kidding! You’ll love it. Just wait and see.
It’s perfect in every way.”
She shakes her head. “It’s not for me.
It’s much too old and gray.”
She thinks he has the worst taste
that the world has ever known.
I guess that’s why they say
to each his own.
But when it’s time to say good-bye,
they both feel so alone.
I guess that’s why they say
to each his own.
